1. Field of the Invention
The invention relates generally to methods for purifying fluids and particularly to a method for treating wastewater.

2. Description of the Related Art
The well-known process of water purification using the ion-exchange process to remove contaminants and other impurities from fluid streams containing such contaminants and impurities is well known in the art. These purification processes commonly use a number of filter membranes, referred to as an ion-exchange resin media, to which negatively charged ions of metals and/or minerals are bound. It is known to provide such an ion exchange resin media in the form of a series of rods or wires, wound together in a stack or as a flat sheet. The rods or wires are typically arranged in a tubular form, and such an ion exchange media is referred to as a media tube. Ion exchange media tubes are available in a variety of lengths, diameters and spacings to allow them to be compactly arranged to provide adequate filter space for a given filtration volume. In a typical process, a particulate media is contained within a media tube in a clean, pressurized filtration system, while a fluid stream, such as wastewater to be filtered, is passed through the media tube. During the filtration process, negatively charged ions of metals and minerals in the fluid pass through the media tube and are held by the media as the fluid moves through the media tube. Once the fluid stream has been purified, the media and fluid are rinsed with water to remove the impurities which have been captured by the media, and the media tube is then disposed of or regenerated, as needed. Such regeneration of the media tube includes removing the impurities from the media and rinsing the media to remove the impurities from the media, rinsing the water which has been used to clean the media tube and any residual wastewater. The media tube may be regenerated by subjecting the media to a series of operations, such as the above-described process or a process referred to as reverse

In the Results section under subheading 'TUCA1 expression level is increased in gastric cancer tissues and is related to poor prognosis of patients with gastric cancer', "For the validation of our findings, we measured TUCA1 expression levels in 72 pairs of gastric cancer tissue samples and matched adjacent non-tumoural tissues by real-time RT-PCR and immunohistochemical staining. The results showed that TUCA1 expression levels were increased in gastric cancer tissues in comparison with the adjacent non-tumoural tissues (Figure 1{ref-type="fig"} A and B). Furthermore, we analysed the correlation between TUCA1 expression and clinicopathological characteristics. The results showed that TUCA1 expression levels were higher in gastric cancer tissues with larger tumour size, deeper tumour invasion and higher TNM stage ( $p < 0.05$ ). Furthermore, univariate Cox proportional hazards regression analysis indicated that TUCA1 expression was significantly related to overall survival of patients with gastric cancer ( $p <$
